Prez Notes

I read with interest the letters published between newsletters. Those written by self-proclaimed "Labrador Breeders" who burn their Julie Brown Directories and demand attendance to their seminars. They hope to go down in history as saviors of the breed. Who are these people? And what sense does it make to destroy volumes of pedigrees that we should be using as information. There are always those who rally to a cause; what the cause is varies from time to time.

Crises in animal husbandry is ongoing. It is not new in dog breeding in general or Labrador breeding in particular. It does however, separate the men from the boys.

At least 15 years ago we were coping with suspected PRA carriers. Then, as now, some chose to spay their breeding stock, sure that the demise of the breed was at hand and not wanting to be involved. At least 50% of those kennels advertised 15 years ago are now nonexistent. Those of sturdier stock who possessed more common sense, utilized the information and persevered. Right or wrong, they remained dedicated enough to the breed to weather the storm; those same people to a great extent are the ones who will persevere now.

There are no easy answers and as my phone rings itself to death, I am disappointed that so many Labrador Folks are choosing to make loud and empty proclamations rather than dedicating themselves to realistically coping with the problem. Ophthalmologists don't seem to agree on much, but one fact remains universally accepted: the incidence of PRA in Labradors will not be reduced until a simple blood test is developed. Percentage-wise, those with any knowledge at all of hereditary defects are in the minority compared to the number of people producing puppies. Just call of few of those ads in Sunday's paper. It is a sad state of affairs. Could it be that to some extent our breed will not only survive this but also benefit in the same sense that it must make caring breeders even more aware of the importance of clearing our breeding stock, and hopefully, send those not dedicated enough screaming into the sunset? Good riddance.

What would be most unfortunate would be if we lowered our standards in other areas for the sake of clear eyes. Hips and seizures remain with us. Perhaps most importantly, we should be aware of increasingly atypical temperaments in our breed. What good is a gorgeous bitch with all the appropriate clearances if she eats you and your stud dog!

I'll get off my soapbox but please remember: if you are not part of the solution, you're part of the problem.

Fondly, Sally
